

Kincaid C. Brown had always been interested in the law—both of his parents are attorneys—so after earning a bachelor's degree in history from the University of Michigan in 1994, Brown pursued a JD at the school. Like many students in law school, he gained bibliographic/librarianship focused. A lot of complaints about law schools have been that attorneys that come out of them aren't ready for practice; and legal research has been a big complaint from law firms. We have tried to incorporate more real-world legal issues so students can take the class and learn actual hands-on research methods.

Are there any professional development opportunities you'd suggest for students